Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Development of Philosophy in Japan: A Dissertation Presented to the Faculty of Princeton University, in Candidacy for the Degree, of Doctor of Philosophy The real beginning of the philosophical development in Japan is the time of the so-called Revolution of Meiji,¹ though the Oriental philosophy of life was well developed many centuries earlier and prepared the Japanese mind in complex, manifold and subtle ways for the new study of the Occidental philosophy. It is, therefore, barely a half century's progress that mainly concerns our present study. Of course it is too short for the mental development of the race, for a decade of years is only one year to the race development. In fact, the Japanese mind is still in the stage of assimilation. It cannot yet show anything which is worthy to be called a native production in the field of philosophy. It is not, however, without interest to study the mental processes of a people, who, until the middle of the nineteenth century, were entirely secluded from the outer world. A...
